Visual theorists have long tried to eliminate the notion of eye as camera--and, with it, the idea that a film is developed in the brain and scanned by a little figure: the homunculus, or ghost in the machine. This implies a mind inside the little man, with its own little homunculus, and so on ad ...

One part of the mind is set to defeat another. Skirmishes can break out on many mental fields of battle, and the most placid, unsuspecting states of mind can be ambushed from the blue by unwanted thoughts. Thought suppression is thus an occasion for mental conflict, a true war of the ghosts in the machine.

behaviour of the other person's body to the states of mind which, by analogy from his own conduct, he supposes to be signalled by that behaviour. Direct access to the workings of a mind is the privilege of that mind itself; in default of such privileged access, the workings of one mind are inevitably occult to everyone else.

A mind that is clouded by thoughts and emotions will concede quickly to the influences of other minds that are overwhelmed by conditioning factors of our existence. These ghosts are nothing more than imaginary imprints caused by lack of awareness. The mind; even a mind that has awakened, is still vulnerable to the trickery of mind ghosts.
